the eleventh letter in our alphabet, its symbol derived from the Egyptian hieroglyphic picture of a bowl. When taken over by the Phœnicians, the letter was called kaph, 'the hand,' and it was transmitted to Greece (kappa), and thence into the primitive alphabet of Italy.

It was not used in classical Latin, since after the invention of g it was superfluous, the letter c having acquired precisely the same sound, that of the sharp guttural mute, which is formed by raising the tongue to the back of the palate. Hence this sound came to be denoted by c in the Latin alphabet and in all the alphabets derived directly from it, such as Italian, French, and Spanish, while the symbol k was retained in the alphabets directly or remotely influenced by the Greek, such as Coptic, Russian, Runic, Gothic, and German. In the southern shires of England, c was at first universal, k being unknown before the 12th century. In the northern or Anglian shires, which possessed the runes, k is found in very early MSS. After the Norman Conquest the phonetic power of c became uncertain, owing to the introduction of its French value of s in such words as cuty, and hence the use of k began to spread southwards, used first before the vowels e and i; where the value of c was most ambiguous (chem) the symbol for potassium (math) generally a constant coefficient also a unit vector perpendicular to i and j as a mediæval numeral, 250.
